WHAT WE THINK

Why 'anti-semitism'?

Every decent and civilised person in the world would like to see an end to 'anti-semitism'. But one of the problems about this unfortunate phenomenon is that public discussion of it, almost without exception, allows only one explanation: 'anti-semites' are bigoted, twisted people who want to attack Jews just out of the malevolence of their natures. Almost never are we allowed to hear any argument to the effect that some 'anti-semitism' may be provoked by the actions of certain Jews themselves, and thereby have a rational basis.

Consider three recent pieces of news...

One comes from the other side of the world — in Australia. Last month a Jewish magazine, Australia-Israel Review, caused a considerable stir by making public a confidential list of 2,000 members of Mrs. Pauline Hanson's One Nation Party. It was said to have been leaked by a disgruntled party official. It is considered a basic human right in a democracy that an individual can belong to a political organisation without his or her name being disclosed in this connection. The Australia-Israel Review violated this rule in a manner so blatant that even many Jews were appalled at its action. Marika Weinberger, a self-proclaimed Auschwitz survivor said: "Those of us who survived came to Australia because privacy was something we cherished and didn't have. We know the implications of what happens when lists are published and handed over."

For the record, the One Nation Party has criticised Australia's present immigration policies, which give preference to non-Whites, but has never made any statement attacking Jews.

Meanwhile, back here in Britain the Government has just approved a £1 million fund to help 500 Jews who claim to have been victims of Nazi persecution. How is it known that these people were persecuted? Apparently just on their own say-so. A Government spokesman has said: "No-one in the British Government will be examining too closely the records of who receives the money and whether they are specifically holocaust survivors. We are basing this fund on need, and that is our whole approach."

Do you think you are someone 'in need'? If so, just write to the Government and tell it you want some of this money, saying that once upon a time in your life you were 'persecuted' and should be compensated. See what sort of a reply you get!

Finally (for the present) a Brighton rabbi has resigned his post following the election as chairman of his congregation of a man in a relationship with a non-Jewish woman. Rabbi Efuné has told the Brighton and Hove Hebrew Congregation that he does not consider the man "would be suitable as chairman for an Orthodox congregation such as ours."

Just imagine for a moment a Church of England vicar resigning in protest against the appointment of an organist who was married to a black woman. Screams of 'racist' would be heard from one end of the country to another.

And no prizes for guessing who would lead the screams!

We pay for defending others

The news media last month announced New Labour's latest 'big defence shake-up'. Whenever we see headlines like these relating to plans by the Blair Government we can be certain that what we are about to read is news of yet more cuts in Britain's already dangerously under-armed forces. And so it was this time. In a report in the Daily Mail (July 8th) it was announced that £915 million was going to be knocked off the defence budget between now and the next General Election. The report went on to say that:-

"Defence Secretary George Robertson will announce a radical restructuring of the Army, Royal Navy and RAF.... At the heart of the reforms will be a new Joint Force 2000 combining crack units from the RAF and Navy to spearhead a more flexible and versatile global defence strategy for the 21st century."

Global defence strategy? Pardon us if we seem ignorant, but we were under the impression that the purpose of Britain's armed forces was to defend the United Kingdom and any other vital British interests elsewhere - interests which these days do not range across the entire globe, only a very limited part of it. So what does Mr. Robertson mean when he uses such phrases?

Perhaps the explanation can be found a little further on in the report, where it is stated that...

"Mr. Robertson says that intervening in disasters will be a major role. 'We do not want to stand idly by and watch humanitarian disasters or the aggression of dictators go unchecked. We want to give a lead. We want to be a force for good.'"

With due respect to Mr. Robertson, being a 'force for good' has nothing whatever to do with a nation's needs in the way of self-defence. Neither does intervention in 'humanitarian disasters' (sic). Armies, navies and air forces are not paid for by the taxpayers for those purposes. They are — to repeat — things to be used for the defence of the nation and its interests.

As for the "aggression of dictators," the context in which Mr. Robertson has used this term suggests two things: first, that only 'dictators' commit acts of aggression around the world; second, that such acts of aggression are committed by 'dictators' necessarily always threaten Britain or her interests. Neither is true.

This magazine does not condemn in principle government efforts to make economies in defence expenditure where those economies simply involve getting better value for money, and where they can be achieved without any reduction in the nation's true defence capability.

But something is very wrong with a defence 'shake-up' in which the Government is telling us in one breath that it wants to save money, and in the next that it considers British taxpayers should be paying for the deployment of our armed forces around the world for purposes many of which have nothing to do with the nation's own interests or security.

"Wanted: More Wh*te Children"

"Is Western civilisation heading for extinction?" was the banner headline on a major feature in the Daily Mail of 18th July. The article detailed the catastrophic fall in the birthrate in every European nation, ours included, to a figure well below replacement level.

"Europe," said author Geoffrey Wheatcroft, "is dying on its feet—or dying in its bedrooms. Our society is fantastically productive of material wealth. What we are less and less good at is producing children."

Describing the trend as a 'fateful development', he warns that "the implications of this in terms of economics, welfare and simply self-confidence are enormous."

The article coyly uses the code phrase 'Western civilisation' rather than the taboo words 'white race'. And, as it is running a prolonged marketing campaign to use its artificial hysteria over the Stephen Lawrence murder to boost sales among upwardly mobile Blacks, the Mail clearly felt it politic to ignore the way in which higher immigrant birthrates mean that the population of Europe is changing colour as well as collapsing.

But the message is clear enough: if Britain and other European nations do not reverse the unprecedented decline in our birthrate, we will indeed become extinct. So, whatever liberal bigots like Alex Carlile may think, we really do need more white children.

On the road to Britain's Bosnia

"Ask any activist in the North if Drumcree happened by accident and they will tell you 'no'. Three years of hard work went into creating that situation, and fair play to those people who put the work in. These are the type of scene changes that we have to focus on, develop and exploit."

So said Sinn Féin-IRA leader Gerry Adams at a secretly taped meeting earlier this year. His boast shows all too clearly how Blair, Ashdown, Hague and all the rest of the Westminster traitors, were dancing to the IRA's tune when they approved of the use of massive military force to stop the Portadown Orangemen walking home from church for eight minutes along a main road, which they have used since it passed only green fields.

Naturally enough, the media had a field day over the terrible murder of the three Quinn brothers. But the truth is that the blame for their deaths, and for all the disturbances unleashed during the loyalists' protests against the trampling of their rights and identity, lies with the architects of the Good Friday sell-out, and with the Parades Commission.

By giving in to republican threats and banning traditional marches from routes which have, in recent years, come to be populated by Catholics, they have sent out a clear message to loyalists: "If you let them settle in your street, it will only be a matter of time before you lose the freedom to walk there as well."

The Establishment's determination to appease and reward the violence and ethnic cleansing campaigns masterminded by Adams & Co. therefore forces desperate loyalists to conclude that they have no choice but to respond with the same kind of evil. That is not the case, but it makes innocent Catholics the targets of attacks by their Protestant neighbours. This is what has made the Good Friday sell-out, right from the start, another step on the bloody road to a British Bosnia.

DANCING ON GRAVES

The Ulster BNP's True Brit editor exposes the joint IRA-media campaign to discredit the Orange Order

TO UNDERSTAND the events surrounding the marching season, one has to understand the nature of the various Sinn Fein-fronted residents' groups which have sprung up over the past three years. Their only purpose is to stop the expression of British heritage and culture in the North East corner of Ireland. The media portray them as simply articulating the concerns of the vast majority of Catholic residents in trying to prevent 'triumphalist' Orangemen tramping down their streets, singing sectarian songs to the tune of 'Kick the Pope' flute bands. The reality is, however, very different, as was demonstrated by a barely reported incident at the onset of the marching season, in Belfast's lower Ormeau Road.

Queens University politics student, Vincent McKenna, is a former IRA member. As a teenager he was charged with bombing the home of an RUC officer, but he left the republican movement seven years ago. Earlier this year, in an attempt to break the deadlock over the parades issue, McKenna decided to carry out a door-to-door survey on the lower Ormeau Road about attitudes to the traditional Orange parade, which, together with the Drumcree event, is the most contentious Orange route in the parades calendar.

Genuine discussions

His aim was to establish a 'Community Forum', which would ensure that the views of everyone in the area on the marching issue were represented. "Its results will be a barometer to ensure that extremists no longer dictate to the majority of people on the Ormeau Road," he commented.

The father of two promptly received a death threat from a senior IRA member, who accused him of "creating propaganda against the republican movement on the Ormeau Road." Mr. McKenna stated that:-

"The man who phoned is a very senior figure in the IRA. He said the movement was angry at my stand on the marching issue and the views I issued to newspapers about the IRA. He told me my 'death wish would soon be granted.' I know the man and I am in no doubt that my life was threatened and that myself and my family are in danger from these people."

What particularly upset Sinn Fein-IRA's Lower Ormeau Concerned Community front was that 71 per cent of residents backed the open community forum proposed by Vincent McKenna. Also in favour was the Apprentice Boys of Derry Order, which expressed a willingness to get involved.

The LOCC, and the IRA hoods who run it, are desperate to prevent such forums, because they would dispel the media-created myth that the Sinn Fein front groups represent the majority feeling among residents. Instead, they insist upon 'face-to-face' dialogue between themselves — the self-appointed 'representatives of the nationalist community' — and the parade organisers. Naturally enough, the Loyal Orders find the prospect of having to negotiate with convicted republican terrorists abhorrent.

Loyalists offer concessions

The Apprentice Boys, whose annual Easter Monday parade along the Ormeau Road was imminent at the time, stated that, as a result of McKenna's survey, they would conduct a well-marshalled, silent parade along the lower Ormeau Road. But Sinn Fein's LOCC rejected this concession. Their spokesman, Gerard Rice — a hate-figure among Unionists — declared that "the only way to resolve this impasse is for the Orange Order and Apprentice Boys to enter into dialogue with us," while continuing to demand "the re-routing of all sectarian parades away from the lower Ormeau."

The Parades Commission (a government quango set up to adjudicate on so-called contentious marches) made the banning of the lower Ormeau Road parade its first decision. Despite all the evidence presented regarding Vincent McKenna's 'Let the People Speak' survey, the Apprentice Boys' willingness to enter into dialogue with the residents, and the organisers' offer to place voluntary restrictions on the parade, the Commission banned it from the traditional route. Parade Commission chairman, Alistair Graham, even had the cheek to state that: "We recognise that the Loyal Orders have difficulty in having direct discussions with residents groups, but there is a whole community there."

Vincent McKenna described the decision to re-route the parade as regrettable but understandable in the face of republican threats of violence. He went on to state that the possibility of genuine compromise "doesn't suit the republican strategy. This is the sound of frightened people who know the world is beginning to see them for what they are."

Media twist the truth again

Not surprisingly, however, the media continue to present the 'residents' groups as the authentic voice of local 'nationalist' communities, and the loyalists as the intransigent bigots. Nothing could be further from the truth. The real reason that decent Catholics don't come forward to reach an honourable agreement with the Loyal Orders is simple: fear of intimidation and violence by republican thugs — as shown by the experience of Vincent McKenna. Meanwhile, the Orange Order and Apprentice Boys are now at pains to point out that they will meet local communities, but not with Sinn Fein-IRA front groups.

A further Sunday church parade along the Ormeau Road was banned by the Parades Commission at the end of April, and the biennial Tour of the North parade in Belfast was re-routed. The Orange Order accepted these rulings, but the grass roots membership was now at breaking point. The final straw was the ban on the Drumcree church parade at Portadown.

The decision to stop the Drumcree parade was announced on June 29th. The announcement of the decision had originally been scheduled for April but, as reported in last month's Spearhead, was delayed on the personal instructions of the Prime Minister until after the referendum and Assembly elections.

The Orange Order, in contrast to previous years, got its act together. A series of well-presented press conferences gave articulate young men such as David Jones and the Rev. William Bingham the chance to put the Orange case to the world's media. They pressed home the number of concessions made by the Order over the years, and the fact that they had received nothing — not even eight minutes of tolerance as they passed the Garvaghy Road — in return. David Jones declared that the Order would not accept being prevented from walking along the route used annually since 1817.

The Garvaghy Road Residents' Coalition — like the LOCC — is a Sinn Féin-IRA front. Its self-appointed spokesman, Brendan MacCionnath (formerly Brenden McKenna; he changed his name by deed poll) has terrorist convictions for firearms offences, false imprisonment and hijacking. The Orange Order rightly rejected demands to talk to him, while expressing a willingness to enter into a genuine community forum.

Cui bono?

Just as events seemed to be going well for the Order, a PR disaster struck. In the early hours of July 2nd, ten Roman Catholic churches were targeted by arsonists in what was obviously a well co-ordinated operation. The media immediately took up Brendan MacCionnath's allegation that this was a further attack on an already beleaguered 'nationalist' community. No mention was made in the national media of the fact that many loyalists were very suspicious as to who was responsible for the attacks.

It was clearly a widescale military operation, but no-one was arrested. The established loyalist paramilitaries favour the Good Friday Sell-Out, while the LVF, being mainly based around Portadown, would have had enough contact with the Orange campaigners to know that this was the last thing they needed. The timing, plus the fact that one of the churches attacked provided Tony Blair with a perfect photo-opportunity, led many to suspect the dirty tricks department of the British Security Services. To any mainland readers who may find this a bit far-fetched, we can only say that the security services have been involved in various murders in the Province, so a few church burnings would definitely not be beyond them.

When Sunday, 5th July came, Orange worshippers emerged from Drumcree church to face newly-dug trenches, miles of barbed wire, barricades and thousands of police and soldiers pointing machine guns at them. Ex-British sevicemen, some of them veterans of the Normandy landings, shook their heads in disgust at the sight. The stand-off had begun.

At first, some 5,000 Orangemen faced the barbed wire of shame. Their numbers dropped during the day, but each night the crowd grew to around 25,000. As protests gathered strength across the country the Establishment began to panic. It was announced, for example, that the Parades Commission would allow an Orange march along the lower Ormeau Road, albeit with a few restrictions, on 13th July. This showed how utterly political the Commission's rulings are, for nothing had changed — except for the fact that between 50,000 and 100,000 Orangemen were now expected to converge on Portadown after their own parades had finished on the 13th July. The security forces simply couldn't cope with a double-stand off in South Belfast as well as at Drumcree.

The most effective protests were totally peaceful. Particularly good were the spontaneous actions of groups of women and children blocking main roads. In one instance a convoy of armoured personnel carriers on its way to reinforce the Drumcree barricade had to turn back when a group of elderly women lay across the road and blocked its route. By contrast, the violence that erupted around the province was totally counter-productive, alienating moderate Unionist opinion and giving the media ammunition with which to attack the Orange stand for civil and religious liberty.

Then, in the early hours of 12th July, three young sons of a Roman Catholic mother died as a result of a petrol-bomb attack on their home in a loyalist housing estate. This came in the nick of time for the Establishment, and the authorities and the media immediately launched a tirade of hatred against the Orangemen. Even before anyone had been arrested, and in spite of the possibility that the attack was drug-related, the tragedy was used with the utmost ruthlessness to split Unionist opinion and to isolate the protestors.

The badly-compromised David Trimble was among the first to call on the Lodges to end their protest. His decision not even to appear at a parade on the big day has, however, completed his disgrace in the eyes of grass-roots Unionists. More important was the plea to end the stand-off made by the Rev. William Bingham, who had earlier articulated the Orange message so well.

Media manipulators

Sammy Wilson of the DUP articulated the feelings of many when he stated that the deaths were being used 'cynically' to force the Order to call off their "quest for a basic human right." His party leader, Dr. Ian Paisley, also attacked the media coverage of the deaths of the three young brothers, and those who were manipulating the murders for their own ends: "There is a lot of dancing on these young fellows' graves."

Under such intense pressure, cracks were appearing in the Orange ranks. There were rumours of resignations if the stand-off continued, and scuffles broke out between brethren in Pomeroy. On 13th July, after subdued parades across the province, only 5,000 gathered at Drumcree. The battle had been lost.

The Orange Order is still continuing a presence at Drumcree, and the traditional Eleventh Night bonfires still remain unlit in Portadown. All eyes will now focus on Londonderry on August 8th, as the Apprentice Boys' annual parade looks set to become the next battlefield in the struggle to maintain British heritage and culture in Ulster.

Nor must the question of Drumcree be allowed to go away — a lost battle does not mean a lost war. The same dirty tricks, violence and tragedy should not derail things next July. The loyalist community has nearly a year to work out a campaign of peaceful, but forceful, civil rights protests. And the Ulster BNP will be in the forefront of the agitation to win back our freedom.

WHY DO THEY DO IT?

In the wake of new outbreaks of football violence in France, JOHN TYNDALL takes a look at some of its possible causes

STUDY of the anatomy of the soccer hooligan is not a new subject; I have attempted a bit of it myself in these pages in the past, and countless mainstream journalists have delved into the matter yet more deeply. They were at it again only recently as fights broke out between supporters of the English World Cup team and their rivals among Tunisian fans in Marseilles. The trouble has probably set back for a good number of years the prospect of the tournament being again staged in this country, though some will say that that is far from being the worst of our national woes.

The sight of one's compatriots mis-behaving abroad is all the harder to take the more nationalist in outlook one is. Obviously, they are letting the side down, and for us that 'side' is much more the focus of a fierce pride and loyalty than it is for life's cosmopolitans. When TV news shots expose some unruly British yobbo, his tee-shirt covered with beer stains, being thrown into a police van by contemptuous gendarmes, it wounds us much more painfully than it probably does a writer of The Guardian newspaper, to whom the phenomenon is a welcome excuse to pontificate in his column about the evils of 'hatred', 'xenophobia' and 'racism' which, in his mind, are inextricably linked with such carryings on.

It is certainly true that the young men who go around the cities of Britain and Europe looking for opposing football supporters to beat up are not, in the main part, politically correct liberals. This provides people of that genre with the perfect pretext to link hooliganism with the doctrines they loathe and fear — convenient for them and inconvenient for us. The reality of the problem, however, is a great deal less simple than that.

Outsider looking in

A glimpse of this reality, albeit a very incomplete one, was provided in an article by Bill Buford in The Sunday Times of June 21st. Buford is an American who lived in Britain for 20 years before becoming the literary and fiction editor of The New Yorker. When here he became fascinated by the psychology involved in football disorders and started writing about it. Under the heading of 'Just fighting for their country?', his article began by saying:-

"Why do 'they' do it and why do 'they' always seem to be English? It would seem preposterous to suggest that there is something about young Englishmen which means they cannot help getting into a fight whenever they gather to watch a game of football, as if it was inherent in the English character. Yet other people — including the Celtic members of the United Kingdom — seem capable of witnessing a sporting event and drinking considerable quantities of alcohol in a spirit of nationalistic celebration, without then feeling compelled to drop a rock on the head of a rival supporter."

I am not sure whether Mr. Buford's neat separation of English from other Britons is here absolutely correct. The Scottish 'Tartan Army' which used to come down to Wembley on regular rampages some years ago was as aggressive a bunch of football desperados as were encountered anywhere. In more recent times, football hooliganism seems to have been controlled better in Scotland than it has south of the border. That may have explanations beyond dubious ethnic ones, but as it is not central to this analysis I shall skip over it here. Let us return to Mr. Buford, who gets close to the core of the issue when he speaks of...

"... the power of nationalism. No-one can question the need for nationalism as a preserver of society; nobody can deny its lethality as a destroyer of society. Its power came home to me when I saw England fans, who believed they had the Italian police on the run in 1990, chant 'England, England' as if they had won some victory.

"That was when it occurred to me: these fools, despised at home, ridiculed in the press, wanted an England to defend — passionately and sentimentally. They did not want Europe; to them, the European Union was incomprehensible."

Of course, there is no particular reason why these fans should be shouting for 'England' rather than for 'Britain' — were it not for the fact that, as a (to foreigners) incomprehensible legacy from the early days of soccer, we oblige our international rivals by dividing the playing strength of the United Kingdom into four by competing as separate countries rather than as one — contrary to our practice in tennis or at the Olympics. France, the winners of this year's trophy, had a Breton in their squad with the un-Gallic name of Guivarc'h. This did not make him any the less of a Frenchman when it came to team selection. It was noticeable that the England fans sometimes broke into Rule Britannia to urge their side on — suggesting that they identified England as being representative of Britain for the purpose of this occasion. The Union Jacks among the St. George's Cross flags told the same story.

"'They',", says Mr. Buford, "always seem to be English" (for which substitute 'British' if you like). That, of course, is not wholly true; foreign national team supporters have their rowdies too. Buford acknowledges that the German fans contain a hooligan element, as of course do the Italians. It is fair to say, however, that football violence started as a British invention and that today English (if not Scots, Welsh and Northern Irish) hooligans are to be found in the greatest numbers and are active with the greatest regularity. There does therefore seem to be some foundation in the theory that the phenomenon has special roots here that are not found to any comparable degree abroad.

Paradox or not?

It is interesting that this "power of nationalism", as Mr. Buford calls it, is strongest in a country whose political leadership and governing classes are, of those around the world, among the very least nationalist in their thinking and their actions — interesting and perhaps not the paradox it may appear to be. Could it be that this militant nationalism of the English football supporter is indeed an atavistic reaction against the extreme anti-nationalism of the political class? History supplies numerous examples of nationalism in peoples being nurtured upon the fertile soil of national defeat, humiliation and servitude. We British in the past found it difficult to understand the intense revanchiste spirit prevalent in France as a result of the country's reverse in the Franco-German War of 1870-71, just as we find strange the German Nationalism that was generated earlier, very largely by the occupation of parts of Germany by the troops of Napoleon — a nationalism expressed in the Berlin lectures of Fichte as French soldiery patrolled outside the windows of the university where he delivered them.

Closer to home, we witness today an intense British Nationalism in Northern Ireland that is incomprehensible to many on the mainland who have not shared in the experiences giving rise to it. It is the nationalism of a people who feel, as too many mainlanders have been slow to feel, that their heritage is under threat. Nationalism, it is true to say, receives impetus through national adversity; in other circumstances it tends to be passive if it is felt at all.

Mr. Buford says: "Nobody can question the need for nationalism as a preserver of society." Nationalism is needed precisely for that purpose, but far from nobody questioning this truth it is not only questioned but decisively supposed to have defeated in the last war rising up and eclipsing us in almost every sector. They witness the craven surrender of our sovereignty and freedom. They witness the gutting of our manufacturing industry and the sale of what's left of it to foreign entrepreneurs. They witness the conquest and colonisation of our towns and cities by the very peoples whom their ancestors conquered and colonised. Having previously witnessed the scuttle from a great empire, they now witness the threatened break-up of their own kingdom while politicians flappedoodle about seemingly impotent to prevent it.

Included in the foregoing is the word 'respect'. In conjunction with the Buford article in The Sunday Times was another one on the same subject of football hooliganism by three writers reporting from France. Interviewing a selection of English tearaways, they drew from one of them this telling statement:-

"Respect, r-e-s-p-e-c-t, that's what it's all about. That and being English. We once conquered the world and now we're being victimised. It's a matter of pride."

The average Sunday Times reader will no doubt look down superciliously on such sentiments; but, inarticulately expressed as they are, they get close to the core of what is politicians, media people, academics, clergy and all the rest of those 'in charge' have failed to defend their England (for which, again, read Britain). 'Failed', in fact, is not an adequate word; these superior folk have not even wanted to defend what belongs to us as a nation. So they have created an England, a Britain, that foreigners love to goad and insult when they meet its representatives abroad. As has been stated before in these pages in another context, a nation which so willingly and so repeatedly presents its backside to the world will assuredly get it kicked. That is in the nature of humanity.

Baited by the Tunisians

It was claimed by the defenders of the football fans who got into trouble in Marseilles in June that it was the fans of Tunisia (whom England were playing at the time) who started it by baiting them. I am willing to believe that this was exactly what happened. That does not make it sensible for the English contingent to have reacted as they did, but at least it contributes to an understanding of what took place — and, possibly, is some mitigation of English behaviour.

Had these English fans been travelling to foreign parts in support of their football team in other times and circumstances — when Britain was admired and respected as a great power whom no-one was able to 'push around' — they might have persuaded themselves that an angry response to the provocation of the Tunisians was unnecessary because our national status and achievements said all that needed to be said on their behalf. That was indeed the way in which most Britons reacted to uncivilised behaviour from foreigners in times past. We could afford to let them shout, scream and throw insults because, deep down, we believed that this was the conduct of people who felt inferior.

Today, the boot of inferiority is very much on the other foot. Inferiority is the status to which Britain itself has been reduced by its rulers. A people with an inferiority complex is sensitive to slights. It says to others: "Don't underestimate us!" and it feels often the need to back up words with blows, as if to emphasise the point.

Maleness and machismo

A frustrated and wounded nationalism, however, may not be the only factor at work here. Let Buford speak again:-

"The English male is different. I write as an American (although one who has lived in Britain for nearly 20 years), and to my outsider's eyes there is a tradition of maleness in Britain that is extreme.

"These are crude observations — any cultural generalisation will be — but the notion of machismo, a code of maleness, being the provenance of the Latinos or the Mediterraneans is a fallacy. The most

Denied a legitimate, constructive outlet, natural male aggression takes on an ugly, nihilistic aspect. Much of the blame must lie with those who have created a society which seems to have no use for healthy young men repudiated in the leftist-liberal doctrine that has been dominant in Britain for the past half-century — dominant, that is, in ruling and opinion-forming circles; that doctrine has not touched the ordinary mass of people to anything like the same extent.

And think what this ordinary mass has had to swallow in the post-war period! There can surely be no nation in the world — certainly not a major one — that has had to suffer any loss of prestige, status, power, wealth, influence and respect comparable to what we have had to suffer in Britain. The masses in this country witness the nations we were wrong. Today's ordinary Briton lives in a country whose leaders' long trail of mismanagement has deprived him of the national self-respect he so badly needs to be a proud, confident and dignified citizen. He observes the contempt in which his country — sad to say, largely deservedly — is held by the rest of the world, and he is angry. It is the anger of wounded pride, and people with this kind of anger can often be led into acting irrationally in an attempt to salvage something of what they have lost. "They wanted an England to defend — passionately and sentimentally," says Buford. Yes indeed, because the coherent code of machismo is here in Britain. The English lad is loutish, territorial and aggressive. This extreme maleness does not, in itself, account for the violence but it provides the pretext: the English lout is easy to provoke.

"There is some kind of male need, at least among certain groups, which calls out for satisfaction, an appetite for confrontation, for proving essential maleness. I do not know where it comes from — the culture, an imperialist history, an islander's sensibility — but it finds its expression in these perverted battlefields."

This is all extremely interesting, and again suggestive at first sight of a paradox. Looking at the British political class, together with its related institutions which shape the prevailing national culture of our times, it is difficult to imagine anything less suggestive of machismo. We actually seem to prefer leaders who are thoroughly camp. A Tory spin-doctor addressing a party conference not long back described Britain, not inaccurately, as a 'feminised culture'. Everything about national political behaviour in recent times has been the very reverse of "territorial and aggressive." We seem much more eager to surrender territory than to defend it, less still aggressively to expand it. What 'English male' is Mr. Buford talking about? Surely not the type who shapes policy, who acts in Britain's name in world affairs, who determines what sort of nation we are! Beholding Tony Blair, and John Major before him, paying court to the sitting President of the United States with all the gushing obsequiousness of the starstruck

'groupie' grateful even for a glance from the eye of the mighty, national machismo is not exactly the term that comes to mind. That writer must have another image of us derived from different experiences in very different company.

But perhaps again it is a question of action giving rise to reaction. The very effeminacy of official, public, 'rebranded' Cool Britannia as she is today may indeed be creating a subconscious urge on the part of those who do not feel part of this to go to the opposite extreme. As I write, the latest antic of this New Labour Government is a scheme to change the laws of boxing so as to prohibit punches to the head. As a youngster I never did any boxing but were the instant recapture of youth to be possible, news like this would probably incline me to rush out to the nearest gym and demand lessons in that very art, with the cranium of the sports minister behind this idiocy being the first target in mind!

The nation we need to become

I don't know whether Mr. Buford is right in saying that there is an extreme tradition of maleness in Britain but if he is it is about time that something of that tradition started to permeate public affairs and the people responsible for them.

We would then be something less of a wimp of a nation than we are today, and we would start to conduct ourselves as self-respecting males have done across the ages: defending the home territory; protecting our women; nurturing our strength and not dissipating it; guarding our pride and our honour; valuing our independence and self-reliance — all things for which modern Britain is not notable.

Could it be that the English fans taunted by the Tunisians in Marseilles back in June were saying to their adversaries in a kind of way: "We're not Tony Blair, Peter Mandelson or Chris Smith. We're not the people responsible for capitulation to the IRA. We're not the ones who've allowed large areas of urban Britain to become alien ghettos. We're not going to let our enemies trample on us. We're going to fight back!"?

I really don't know. Theorising on a subject like this is a hazardous pastime at the best of times. I may be wide of the mark in these speculations.

But of one thing I am certain. Stupid though the behaviour of our football berserkers is, the day when the whole of our population becomes cast in the mould of the political class — willing to surrender territory and be humiliated rather than fight, unprepared to defend the nation's honour, totally without patriotism and national pride — that day will be the day on which we may as well abdicate any pretensions to nationhood, and the world will be right to despise us utterly.

Will the spirit of manly aggression of which Mr. Buford has spoken be doused by the wave of political correctness and 'unisex' ideals in which our rulers are determined to engulf us?

Or will it be channeled, controlled and disciplined so that it may be directed to useful rather than anti-social purposes — made the engine of national rebirth and achievement rather than the cause of national disgrace?

"Do we have any more time to waste?"

UNITY '98

Another big step forward

THE BIGGEST-EVER meeting of the British National Party in the West Midlands took place on Saturday 11th July. Called to put the final seal on the merger between the BNP and the areas former National Democrats, this 'Unity' rally brought together 130 members and supporters to hear speeches by two former leading NatDems, Sharron Edwards and Simon Darby, together with East Midlands Regional Organiser John Peacock, BNP Director of Publicity Nick Griffin, and party Chairman John Tyndall.

Sharron spoke of how warmly she and her colleagues had been welcomed into the BNP, and appealed to other nationalists who haven't yet made the same move: "They should ask themselves two questions: 'Do we have any more time to waste?' and 'do we want to?' The Establishment can't handle British nationalists all fighting for one cause, getting organised and getting on with serious community politics."

Hard at work

Describing how the newly formed Black Country BNP was already working with local householders and Residents' Associations on issues such as a big proposed mosque extension, Sharron related how such tactics had been adopted by black politicians like Bernie Grant among their own people, and had set them on the road to political power. Urging the BNP to take note, she explained that: "The BNP is becoming a well-oiled political machine, ready to take mainstream politics by storm. All we need is to fit the ignition key — community politics."

Sharron was followed by Nick Griffin, who reminded the audience that the real purpose of the BNP was nothing less than to secure the survival in Britain of the people who, as the latest genetic research now shows, have inhabited this land for at least 30,000 years.

"However," he continued, "there's no point trying to get that across to ordinary members of the public, although it's totally true it's simply beyond their comprehension. They just think you're crazy." It is essential to 'sell' the BNP in simple, commonsense terms. "What we stand for, what we have to offer the average voter can be summed up in four words: "Security; freedom; democracy, and identity."

Nick went on to elaborate on these four key words. Security from crime and from the uncertainty and exploitation of globalisation. Freedom from the EU, red tape and the petty tyranny of political correctness. Democracy — rooting out corruption and sleaze, and ensuring that government should obey the wishes of the majority of the people on the really important issues — such as capital punishment for child murderers, and the retention of laws designed to protect teenagers from predatory homosexuals. Identity — making sure that the unique ethnic and cultural heritage of the native people of our islands is preserved, and ensuring that our grandchildren have a place to call their own.

Optimistic

After a short break, East Midlands stalwart John Peacock recounted how the BNP had been formed by unifying several different fragments of the nationalist movement, and spoke for everyone present when he said how good it is to see the process of unification continuing and nearing a successful conclusion. He was optimistic about the future as a result: "Divided we would fall, but united we will win."

The next speaker was another newcomer to the party, former NatDem Information Technology Officer, Simon Darby. Simon spoke on the significance of the Internet, and on his work to set up the BNP's ground-breaking BNP website. This already had Real Audio soundfiles as well as text, pictures and e-mail facilities for all the units in the region, he explained. "And, as of tomorrow, it will have video clips as well, starting with the BNP's 1997 general election broadcast, which will be available to anyone on the web, anywhere in the world, 24-hours-a-day!"

On the rise

Highlight of the meeting was a powerful speech by BNP Leader John Tyndall. We are, he said, living in dramatic times — the end of the era of globalism, liberalism and cultural decadence. Ethnic nationalism is on the rise in white countries all over the world. Making the same thing happen in Britain was bound to be more difficult because of the nature of our political system, with its first-past-the-post elections. However, part of the weakness of the nationalist movement was self-inflicted. We will not even start to emulate the achievements of our friends on the Continent until we are properly united: one single party representing British Nationalism instead of several in rivalry with one another.

Mr. Tyndall spoke of the loyalty which ties many good nationalists to smaller parties. This, he said, is up to a point a commendable virtue. However, there is a greater loyalty which is far more important — the loyalty to nation and race. When there is a conflict between loyalty to party and that to nation and race the latter must always come first.

Mr. Tyndall concluded by referring again to the political successes of the BNP's continental allies. They have made it happen in their countries, he said. Together, united, we can make it happen here!"

The Dutch Auction-style collection, ably run by the meeting's chairman, West Midlands Regional Organiser Keith Axon, raised a magnificent £827, which has gone to give a very healthy kick-start to the West Midlands Euro election fund.

"Security, freedom, democracy and identity. These four words sum up what the BNP offers the people of Britain."

ELECTRONIC HERESY

SIMON DARBY explains why the enormous potential of the Internet for the BNP is giving the liberals nightmares

IT WOULD take me several days to convey the full implications to our society of the new form of information delivery that the Internet provides. The mechanism whereby information is transmitted and received can be likened to that of a domestic television channel. But, rather than just one programme at a time being broadcast, there are literally millions of sources of information to choose from. Some of them, as regular readers will know, belong to the BNP, or to similar organisations around the world. But even though most of our members are aware of our cyberspace presence, fewer understand the full potential of this new publicity medium.

Information on the Internet mainly consists of text and still images, but recently video and sound files have become more prevalent. Specifically, anyone wanting to find out about the BNP only has to type on their keyboards 'BNP' and a little box of tricks known as a Search Engine auto-matically take them to our sites.

Awesome implications

With Britain having nearly the highest personal computer ownership level in the world and with access to the Internet as simple as connecting a modem to a telephone line the implications for British society are truly awesome.

Yet, rather than dwell on the technicalities of this information revolution, instead I wish to focus on the possibilities of this still inchoate media for the nationalist scene here in Britain.

As many of us know, the present political system in Britain can only survive by effectively stifling all legitimate and articulate criticism. Access to thoughts and ideas that challenge the 'three-card-trick' politics of modern Britain has been almost totally closed. Any journalist who dared to set his sights consistently on something more fundamental than conventional party politics, would soon find himself staring at a P45.

Such is the process of political correctness, or political censorship, for those of us who prefer to deal in real words rather than sugar-coated psycho-babble.

Colostomy bag politics

In modern Britain, colostomy bag politics now prevail, ensuring that real issues and concerns to our nation are conveniently bypassed. However, as mentioned earlier, this bogus form of government via virtual reality can only survive as long as it can effectively suppress anyone who shows it for exactly what it is. With all media outlets effectively operating a liberal, multicultural, internationalist closed shop for the last four decades at least, this is exactly what has happened.

The arrival of the internet has changed all of this. All of a sudden, the 'safe' channels of communication and information have been circumvented. People on the net are now free to read, discuss and debate opinions free from the cling-film censorship policies operated by the left-wing editors, producers and directors. Similarly, the anonymity of the net ensures that the libel laws, which shielded from truth the likes of the pension- embezzling media magnate, Robert Maxwell, are suddenly obsolete.

Censorship backfires

Clumsy attempts to censor websites that do not conform to establishment models have resulted in nothing but adverse publicity. A classic example was the attempt by the enemies of free speech and open historical debate to close down the website used by German-Canadian revisionist and civil rights campaigner, Ernst Zundel — an encounter that would not disgrace an episode of the Keystone Cops. Can you imagine their horror when, over the next week, anti-political censorship sympathisers put up mirror sites all over the world, amplifying Zundel's message by a factor of twenty!

It must not be taken for granted that this neat and unexpected route to the collective cerebral cortex of our nation will remain passable indefinitely. Already there have been serious grumblings from the Government and teaching heads over the potential access to 'racist' material by children. Paradoxically, the very same bodies seem to have no such concerns over exposing children as young as six to the influence of homosexuality. Perhaps, considering the leanings of several senior figures within the Labour Party, this move could be judged as an investment for the future!

"People on the net are now free to read, discuss and debate opinions, free from the cling-film censorship policies operated by the left"

It should not be unexpected if a raft of internet legislation complementing the overbearing Race Relations Act were to be seen in the future. This could feasibly be implemented using the problem of internet pornography as an emotive Trojan Horse.

Fortunately, however, there are enormous logistical problems associated with trying to legislate against websites. For instance, the BNP Midlands website is not registered in the Tipton or Telford, but Tonga. It is more plausible that the powers that be would target webmasters and individual contributors resident in Britain. Here too, though, they would run into problems, for the site password-holder can upload new material to the site from any telephone, including public payphones and mobiles, anywhere in the world!

Furthermore, even this Government must be mindful of the damage repeated attempts to incarcerate its political dissidents is beginning to do. As for the Tongans, considering the attitude towards Asian immigration of their Fijian neighbours, I don't think we have much to worry about.

All in all, if the Internet really were capable of being censored, the extremely powerful enemies of historical revisionism in particular would already have found a way to do it. The fact that they have failed to do so suggests that it cannot be done.

Uncontrollable technology

If you want to grasp its uncontrollability and potential, visualise it not as just one more TV station which just happens to be willing to give us airtime at present, but as a hundred million biros put into circulation in a world where, up until now, pens were fantastically expensive and only available to the tame scribes of a global dictatorship.

An alternative description of the scale of the change going on before our eyes is the increasingly common view that the Internet is "the most important development in communications since the invention of the printing press."

The Internet not only offers a free speech gateway; by exposing and discrediting the mass-media mechanism that previously controlled the distribution of ideas, it threatens to blow the established forms of media communication out of the water. Our opponents that have worked so hard to internationalise us (or mongrelise us, to employ the sugar-free synonym) are faced with the prospect of their most powerful weapon not only being nullified but actively turned against them.

For example, it wouldn't even cross the minds of the vast majority of British people that their television sets are being used subtly to shape their opinions and change social attitudes. The British people have come to trust completely those few powerful internationalists who control the airwaves. But such brainwashing only works when people are unaware that it is being done. It will rapidly cease to be anything other than counter-productive once the tricks of the trade and the absurdities of the liberal multiracialists' propaganda are exposed and ridiculed.

And that we can now do. The BNP has just acquired the video-capture capability to take clips of this poison off live TV and television adverts that blatantly promote race-mixing in the middle of a natural history program that highlights the decline in the variety of types of British bird, is to use the very power of that propaganda against its creators. What do you think would happen in ornithological circles if someone advocated that all types of bird should mix together, so generating a drab, brown, squawking little number... a kind of standardised avis vulgaris. The consequent fate of the unfortunate propounder of such a notion is enough to prompt anyone to telephone Ladbrokes and ask for the odds on the first person in history to be pelted to death with binoculars!

Politically correct absurdities

Likewise, we should not lose too much sleep when presented with television debates such as Newsnight that have, for example, the spectacle of a member of the Notting Hill Carnival Committee commenting on the events in Ulster. Very soon, the fact that we can draw public attention to the absurdity of such Orwellian conditioning will turn it into propaganda for us!

As I hope you can now appreciate, the concept of a 'rogue' media outlet, exposing the fantasy world of our mass media, has grave implications for those who wish to keep the thought processes of the masses tame and sterile. The prospect of a widely accessible apparatus able to highlight and systematically dismantle the techniques employed to influence and control our minds has genuinely taken those who have most to lose by complete surprise.

Now, before I am pulled up on the fact that the Internet is nowhere near as accessible to the populace as other forms of communication, I would like to expound on the implications of digital television.

For decades now, terrestrial, cable and satellite television has been broadcast as a relatively cumbersome analogue signal. In future, new television services will be broadcast in a digital format. In other words, the signal broadcast is binary and has to be decoded by a digital signal processor in order for it to be seen as a picture on your screen. The advantage of digital broadcasting is that it uses a tiny fraction of the space that a conventional analogue signal would. Consequently, hundreds of channels can be squeezed

Current developments in Information Technology are revolutionising commerce, education, finance and even warfare; politics too are being transformed broadcasts, and to put them, together with appropriate damning analysis, on its own Internet TV station! We can now begin to laugh at Radio 5 interviews debating racism in the police force with a panel consisting solely of a member of the 70 per cent 'ethnic' Commission for Racial Equality and a member of the association of Black Police Officers. And we will not laugh alone.

Simply to point out the absurdity of

through in digital format whereas only a limited number would have been possible in analogue mode.

So who is going to fill all the space? Yes, you've guessed it. To the likes of News Corporation and Carlton, digital TV offers an ideal vehicle for expansion and profit. But they need a big sales gimmick to persuade people to buy the little black boxes needed to decode the signal. And that is going to be the fact that they will also give them Internet access.

To Rupert Murdoch and Michael Green, whose high-gear company strategies compounded with their lust for communication dominance, the Internet has the appeal of a candle-flame to moths. Subsequently, by the end of this year Britain will have no less than three digital television services, all of which will offer Internet access to their customers. BskyB have already launched their digital service while in October the Carlton and Granada-owned BDB (British Digital Broadcasting) makes its debut. These two services will later be joined by the major players amongst the cable television companies.

Easy access

Between them, over the next few years, these companies are going to link the majority of British homes to the Internet, even if not one extra computer or modem were ever sold in this country again. The prospect of the television viewing public being able freely and easily to access our Internet sites from their armchairs is drawing ever closer. What is more, many of the new breed of TV shows which will develop to exploit the new facility will be interactive quizzes and such like, which will quickly teach the masses how to use their Internet links.

With this opportunity comes the challenge of encapsulating our message in an appealing, sophisticated and palatable form. The public will not want to look at static pages of text alone. No, they will expect any serious player to present them with attractive graphics, sound, video and the chance to interact with our products and even our personnel too. Now is this a dream of some starry-eyed technobore or is this a tangible proposition for our movement? Well, last year's BNP election broadcast can now be seen on the Internet. Already, thousands of people have listened to the sound files available on our sites. Viewers can already access 'BNPtext' news updates, browse our galleries, libraries and even take part in real time polls.

Forbidden fruit

Our opponents know full well the appeal of a message that has been blanked out and forbidden for mass consumption for so long. This, coupled with the fact that our message is of pin-sharp relevance to so many ordinary British men and women will ensure our ideas can no longer be kept on the fringe.

E-commerce (electronic trading and transaction) will offer a golden opportunity to any nationalist movement ambitious enough to embrace and invest in this new technology. This will bring in the necessary funds to enable our cyber operations to become self-financing.

All in all, the Internet offers the future opportunity of replicating everything that our current mass media provide, and more. It can evolve into a kind of free-thought counter-culture openly mocking the Palaeolithic mentality of the champions of political censorship and subliminal brainwashing.

But in concentrating on the broader implications of the internet we must not ignore the intrinsic benefits it offers to the nationalist movement in this country. Patriots from not just all over Britain but all over the world can share ideas and experiences openly. In doing so they reaffirm their own beliefs and show that they are the complete opposite of the kind of olde worlde isolationists that they are falsely accused of being. Not just mental, but physical strength will be gained from this new-found commonality amongst not just our own but different peoples as well.

For the first time in a generation, academics, students and professional people can tap into a consistent and uncontaminated stream of nationalist thought and ideology. The increasing sophistication of automatic translation programmes even means that we will be able to communicate with nationalists in France and Russia as easily as America and Australia.

Already an embryonic cyber-crucible of patriotic interaction has been created. Discussion groups and forums once dominated by the left are finding out what it is like having to play on an even field. As fully-blown multiracialism begins to emerge from its previous inner-city exclusion zones, it is not just the working classes that are having their eyes opened. The white-liberal nightmare of a growing 'intellectual right' is becoming a reality.

Consequently, as more and more people begin to realise that the present political system in Britain is inextricably linked to its mass media, the political scene is beginning to evolve from that of archaic mono-dimensional party politics into a more sophisticated two-dimensional variant. As such, the system itself is starting to come under the microscope, as are the cowards and traitors that hide behind it.

No alternative to nationalism

For the people who oppose us this would be worrying enough in itself, but it also comes at a time when their very effective destruction of left-wing economic ideas and idealism has removed the only possible competition for the hearts and minds of a population squeezed by the ruthless demands of the new globalist hegemony. The political ground that could once have supported a bogus but credible alternative which could have stolen our thunder has been thoroughly scorched.

The radical left, the traditional safety valve of political dissent, is a spent force. It has nothing of any relevance to say to the white working class of Britain's inner-cities. Our people now look upon its tired, recycled anti-British rhetoric with as much respect as they would a dog that would return to its own vomit.

BNP LAUNCHES ANTI-EURO DRIVE WITH STRIKING NEW LEAFLET

'Save Our Sterling!' This is the popular message of the BNP's latest national leaflet. Double-sided and two-coloured, this topical leaflet is perfect both for recruitment and to 'warm up' voters for the coming European election. It also draws attention to the party's main anti-EU website. Publicity material like this will help to build up a large, regular audience for the BNP's Internet operation. 1,000 'SOS' leaflets cost £8 plus £5.15 p&p.

EURO-CAMPAIGN THE KEY TO BUILDING THE BNP INTERNET AUDIENCE

NEXT year's Euro-election will provide a golden opportunity to publicise the British National Party's cyberspace operation. The BNP's websites will be advertised on a combination of TV and radio broadcasts, millions of election addresses and many hundreds of thousands of back-up leaflets and posters.

Once Internet users know about our sites, they will be able to keep coming back to them, time and time again, long after the election itself has been and gone.

In order to get the maximum possible benefit from this exposure, it is essential that each BNP site is 100 per cent professional. While they are already very good, this means that some extra investment — in more webspace, faster modems and a digital camera — is needed over the next few months.

This is one of the many 'behind the scenes' preparations which will be paid for by donations to the Euro-election fund. Just one more reason why we ask all readers to dig as deeply into their pockets as possible.

See the report below for the latest news on the appeal — and please do whatever you can to help reach the vital £50,000 target as quickly as possible.

opportunity is now rapidly opening whereby we can re-establish collective contact with the hearts and minds of our people. For they are beginning to look around them at the cesspit society that those in government over the last few decades have inflicted upon them. They are beginning to doubt those in power who try to censor, ostracise, silence and even imprison anyone who dares speak out against them.

Politicians are widely regarded as the lowest, most deceitful creatures in public life, and journalists and reporters are scarcely better regarded. The economic prosperity which camouflaged their incompetence and treason is at an end. A fin de siecle air of decay and cynicism is combining with a millennial expectation of chaos and great change. The time has come!

Not only that, but great political upheavals are often associated with the successful exploitation by those who stand for change of new techniques of persuasion. For the nationalist wave of the twenty first century, that new technology is the Internet.

£50,000 EURO-ELECTION FUND — OVER THE QUARTER — £12,523 RAISED SO FAR

Last month saw donations of £1,390 to the BNP's national Euro-election fund. In addition, £6,269 has now been recorded as having been collected at unit and regional level. This includes a further £1,000 raised by Redbridge Branch, £280 raised in the East Midlands, £1,000 raised in South East London, £250 in Glasgow, £300 collected last month in Woking, and an opening balance of £894 in the West Midlands regional fund. Smaller units which are also working hard to build up their own totals include Stoke, Waltham Forest, Bexley & Dartford and York. A grand total of £12,523 has now been raised towards the vital target of £50,000.

We're getting there, but there's still a long way to go. Have you really given what you can afford? Is your unit really pulling its weight? If not, please take action today to put things right. You won't be alone in making the extra effort.

Please make cheques/PO's payable to 'British National Party' and send c/o PO Box 117, Welling, Kent, DA16 3DW. In order to save on administration time and costs, donations below £10 will not be acknowledged unless accompanied by an SAE. Fighting next year's Euro-elections will be another huge step forward for the BNP. But we need your support to take it. Please act today!

"UNDER CONSTRUCTION"

NICK GRIFFIN outlines the next stage in the creation of the BNP's power-winning machine

THERE is no doubt that the next few years offer exciting possibilities for the BNP. Organisational improvements, deteriorating economic and social conditions, and an intangible fin de siècle air which has millions half-longing for, half-fearing, but definitely expecting, radical change of some sort, are all combining to create a virtuous cycle of activity, recruitment and growth.

Of particular note at present has been the marked improvement in the quality of the recruits brought in during and since last year's general election. However, to use an extreme example, it is definitely a waste to recruit a professor and then to send him to leaflet Tranmere Rovers. So the changed circumstances provide us with the need, as well as the opportunity, to expand our operations in order to make the best use of the talent which is becoming available to us.

In sketching an outline of the sort of things which could be done, I intend to refer to those new initiatives which are primarily a matter of internal organisation as 'teams', and those which relate more to publicity and recruitment as 'circles'. Both, however, are only working titles, and better ones may emerge in the course of subsequent debate and experience.

Up until now, of course, the BNP has always been organised on a purely geographical basis. Our commitment to electioneering, and the continued value of leafleting, paper sales and local meetings as the basis for mass recruitment, means that this will remain the appropriate form of organisation for the large majority of members. That said, there is a sense in which the tendency to think in terms of organising in geographically determined Branches and Groups is simply an automatic response — a hangover which has afflicted all political parties from the days before telephones, let alone the Internet.

While elections and campaigns will continue to demand organisation by geography, it is equally certain that, if we are to make the most of them, other structures must be put into place. Building up support among potentially sympathetic groups of electors, and fund-raising on a scale which enables us to run really professional campaigns, are two obvious examples of work which needs to be done long before polling day.

Tasks, not towns

In some of these cases, our efforts will be much more productive if we get out of the habit of thinking in terms of specific towns and cities, and concentrate instead on creating groups whose primary party job is to carry out certain key tasks.

Demanding as they do special skills and interests, such groups are likely to need to involve people scattered all over the country, rather than based in the same area. Fortunately, the extraordinarily rapid growth of communications technology, such as fax machines, e-mail and video conferencing, has provided the means to for them to keep in constant contact, however far apart they may live.

As already mentioned, these task-based BNP sub-groups fall into two main, though not mutually exclusive, categories:

by common denominators other than geographical location

Nor is this idle theorising or wishful thinking; rather, it simply categorises developments which are already taking shape within the party.

Three very important teams which the BNP is at present working to create are the Media Monitoring group proposed in my article in June's Spearhead, an Internet Team, and a Merchandising Team. This latter operation will bring together a group of long-standing members with particular interest or talents in developing, marketing and distributing a bigger range of fund-raising items. The initial personnel for both these teams are already more or less identified, and the party should begin to see the benefits of their efforts shortly.

Three other areas where teams are urgently needed are in the fields of video production, political education, and social/fund-raising activities. Regular readers will know that good starts have been made with the first two of these, but more volunteers are still needed to help put flesh on the bones.

Examples of circles which would be of enormous benefit to the party include one concerned with agricultural/rural matters, a campaign designed to bring into our orbit some of the growing number of convinced and concerned opponents of European Monetary Union, a youth movement, and a group for parents concerned about politically correct indoctrination in schools.

The first of these is, as mentioned elsewhere in this issue, already beginning to develop. Other possibilities will spring to the minds of those most suitable for leading the way in their chosen field.

Once the principle is understood and acted upon, new recruits in particular will provide us with the expertise and drive for further new ventures. Individuals whose particular enthusiasms might make them counter-productive bores if let loose among those who do not share their passions, could well be highly effective at recruiting others who do. A case of hobbyhorses for courses!

The precise roles of the teams will be quite easily worked out between the party leadership and the specialist personnel who will have to do the day-to-day work.

There will, perhaps, be rather more debate about how the circles should operate. For example, precisely how close should they be to the British National Party?

Part of their value could well be to provide

IT is difficult to know which aspect of the British National party's official complaint to the Radio Authority against Lewis-based Isle FM — for describing the party as "fascist" — is the most worrying: the idea that even the BNP possesses finer feelings, or the idea that Stornoway harbours a cabal of lederhosen-clad, swastika-tattooed Übermenschen who scan the radio waves for slander then report back to their leader, the Great Horned One, at The Romford Reichstag, to receive further instructions.

For this latter notion, unlikely as it sounds, must be the case; unless, of course, the British National party happens to employ the most thorough of monitoring organisations to scan the media on its behalf and pass on what the world is saying about it.

6 Congr

With the BNP's media monitoring team only in its infancy, the Scottish Sunday Times, notes the change. As a direct result of the BNP complaint, Isle FM had to broadcast a retraction, twice.

As soon as the monitoring team is fully operational, the party leadership will turn its attention to the launch of the next most urgently needed team and circle. In the meantime, please send any suggestions, constructive criticisms and offers of help to: PO Box 14, Welshpool, Powys, SY21 0WE.

a 'halfway house' for members of the public who are particularly sympathetic to one part of our message, but who may not be ready to join the party straightaway. Too distanced from us, and such groups would take up valuable time and resources to run without giving us sufficient returns; too close, and they may serve too little purpose to be worthwhile.

Such questions can only be answered through experience, so we will have to take the plunge and perfect our stroke as we go.

Needless to say, even where suitable groups of volunteers can be found, the party will not have the resources to train and equip them all in one go. In fact, all the leadership can do in any case is to assess ideas, give the go-ahead to the ones judged most likely to bear fruit, and help to set them in motion.

In effect, this is the middle stage; the initial motivation and the drive to turn the vision into reality, and to keep it going, will have to come from the grass roots — they have to come from people like you.

You tell us!

The starting point is to tell us what you think you could do. In modern business terminology, what the BNP needs is a skills audit. But we don't have the time to ask thousands of sedentary nationalists what they could do if they ever got out of their armchairs. Instead, we need to hear from the handful of self-motivators who are prepared to set their own targets, and to work to exceed them without someone cracking the whip.

Do not underestimate the importance of what is being proposed here, for it has the potential to broaden rapidly the entire organisational structure of the British National Party, just as we enter a period in history when a professionally-run nationalist movement could explode into the political big-time.

Our clear target must be to have at least the foundations of all this in place ready to be able to integrate effectively the wave of recruits who will inevitably be attracted through next year's Euro election campaign.

Perhaps most important of all, the creation of a cluster of teams and circles, in addition to our established and expanding geographical network of branches and groups, will allow us to put to effective use the talents of the growing number of people attracted to our cause who, for genuine professional and personal reasons, are not able to join the also-growing ranks of those who are in a position to leap from the trenches and help out with hand-to-hand political battles.

Any successful modern army needs more personnel in support positions than as front-line soldiers, and the same is true in politics. It isn't just a matter of the professor being out of place at Tranmere Rovers, it is a waste of his potential to send him there in the first place, even if he is willing to go. Isn't he far more likely to make a really valuable contribution working, quite possibly behind the scenes, in a team or a circle?

In part at least, the concept is inspired by a recent visit to the Front National headquarters in St. Cloud, Paris. This is a magnificent building, with about 60 full-time staff fulfilling every conceivable need of a ambitious and modern political party.

At first sight, it is light-years ahead of the BNP but, on reflection, I realised that our own administrative, propaganda and other 'central' operations already perform — albeit on a much smaller scale — at least 60 per cent of what is done at St. Cloud. And, once the first wave of teams and circles are up and running, that figure should rise to at least 85 per cent, with much of the remainder being wholly inapplicable to the situation here in Britain.

Over-centralisation

There is virtually nothing which is done in that one huge complex which could not be done from a number of decentralised points. The place is so big that, in any case, different departments often contact each other by 'phone or Intranet rather than by walking down the maze of corridors. They could just as easily be at different ends of Paris, or France! Indeed, when asked why it was felt necessary to print every single local election address put out in the whole of France in the basement, my guide admitted that over-centralisation is a notorious French vice.

And, of course, assembling all one's eggs in a single basket has big security disadvantages. Furthermore, it is not the building which makes a headquarters, it is the people who work there. Even if we could afford the building, we couldn't possibly assemble at any single location in Britain a staff with the range and depth of talent on which we can already draw across the country.

Fortunately, we do not need to. As already mentioned, modern communications systems make it perfectly feasible to connect these people, for a fraction of the cost, to a 'Virtual Headquarters'. Apart from the acquisition of video conferencing facilities, and the sheer number of members around the country who could be involved, there isn't even anything new to us in such an operation. For the last two years, for example, Spearhead has been produced by just such a decentralised team.

The BNP is by no means the only organisation going along this road. The phenomenally high cost of prestige offices, and of staff, in cities such as London and New York are leading to exactly the same trend in some of the biggest and most competitive corporations on Earth. The Virtual Headquarters is not a second-best option, but state-of-the-art business practice.

As new technology, a failing economic system, and the new millennium, bring a totally new set of opportunities into British politics, the varied and flexible organisation which the BNP needs to take advantage of it all is most definitely 'under construction'. If you can help to build it, we need to hear from you — now!

RIGHTS FOR WHITES! That's the title of the best compilation album of the year. Produced in Sweden, but with all but two of the 12 tracks sung in English, Rights For Whites is mainly rock/Oil-inspired music, by some of the best bands around.

This powerful CD includes tracks by Celtic Warrior, Whitelaw, White Lightning (featuring Billy from Celtic Warrior and Aussie Nigel), Germania and Storm — two of the classiest young bands in Sweden, and Norwegian band Norhat.

Rights For Whites is a 'must' for the collection of every fan of the modern white music scene in its own right, but there's another reason to buy it as well: Its producers, Blod och Åra, from Uppland, Sweden, have very generously donated 100 copies of this cracking CD to the British National Party's Euro-Election fund! Every penny raised through sales of Rights For Whites will go to help the BNP make the biggest possible impact in next year's Euro election. Many thanks, Sweden!

WAYS TO SPOT A WRONG 'UN

ERNST ZUNDEL warns is that people with psychiatric disorders ruin people's — and organisations' — reputations.

This article was first published in Ernst Zundel's Power newsletter. We are reproducing it here because the experiences of the author closely parallel experiences we have had of similar people in the patriotic movement in Britain. The article provides excellent guidance to people in our movement in the art of spotting a 'wrong 'un'.

Readers wishing to know more about Mr. Zundel's continued legal battles for free speech and the right to historical debate should send a donation to Samisdat, 206 Carlton Str., Toronto, Ont., Canada, M5A 2L1. Website: www.webcom.com/ezundel/english/

I HAVE often wondered in the last few years why it seems that the racist/nationalist movement attracted so many clearly imbalanced people, who do things which do nothing but harm to our cause, and who often turn into spies and traitors.

In Canada in the last two weeks, some obviously deranged people toppled gravestones in a cemetery, and were caught and convicted. Then friends and relatives of these sickos apparently went back after the gravestones were put back in place, and toppled them again. To my mind, only a sick person could do that.

The weeks previous saw five or six young whites brutally beat an old night watchman at a Hindu temple in the Vancouver area. Only sick people could commit a crime like that. They were promptly caught, but the poor watchman died, and the racial/nationalist movement is stuck with the tarnish of being a collection of deranged people with so much hate in them that they beat to death an old coloured immigrant for no other reason than the colour of his skin. At least, that's what the papers claim.

I remember the case of a young woman in Toronto, attracted to the movement, who made fiery speeches, participated in demonstrations, was overheard making outrageous remarks, and behaved like a super-patriotic activist. Frequently these people work their butts off, end up in the beds of some of the leaders and, usually after only brief encounters with the authorities following arrests, or even only after police visits, they become spies and traitors and rat out on all their friends, testifying in courts or before parliamentary committees.

This has concerned me for some time, and I therefore decided to consult the medical libraries, medical doctors, especially psychiatrists who had written research papers on the kind of people who bring this instability to the movement. John Hopkins University, medical textbooks, and lengthy conversations with relatives, some of them medical doctors, of some of the people concerned, have supplied me with considerable insight and understanding.

Not a berk

One particularly useful book is Without Conscience, by Prof. Dr. Robert Hare, who teaches Psychology at the University of British Columbia, and specialises in psychopathology. He builds on the classic study by Dr. Hervey Cleckley, The Mask of Sanity, which first appeared in 1941 and has since gone through many printings. Both books are easy to read, even for laymen like me.

Most of the authorities I have studied refer to the people who cause the movement the most trouble as psychopaths, who in turn fall into groups and subgroups such as 'criminal', 'sub-criminal' and 'successful' psychopaths. The studies range from serial killers like Bundy and Olson, and homosexual murderers like John Wayne Gacy, to just plain little insignificant people with fragile egos, such as we meet at speeches or rallies as hangers-on and groupies.

The 'successful psychopaths', as the experts call them, are not usually in jail or mental hospitals, because their symptoms are milder. Dr. Hare says that these types function seemingly normally as lawyers, doctors, police officers, business people, entertainers, etc.

These individuals act every bit as ego-centric, callous and manipulative as the average criminal psychopath, but their intelligence, family background, social skills and circumstances permit them to construct a facade of normalcy and to get what they want with relative impunity.

Trail of destruction

Says Dr. Hare about these 'successful psychopaths':

"Their success is offset by the broken hearts, shattered careers, and used-up people left in their wake as they cut a zigzag route through society, driven by a remorseless need to 'express themselves'."

Dr. Hare states that because their successes are illusory and always at someone else's expense, he likes to call them 'sub-criminal psychopaths'. He also says that many of them hover at the edge, just on the shady side of the law.

Dr. Hare says that they are very good at putting on a good impression when it suits them. Even though they are the victimisers, they often paint their victims as the real culprits. He quotes case studies in which outwardly seemingly normal psychopaths were nevertheless the source of most of certain business conflicts. One of their hallmarks is their intemperate language and tempestuous behaviour, frequently demanding that co-workers who displeased them or had caught them lying should be summarily fired. Power-tripping is one of their chief stocks in trade.

Dr. Hare has sections in his book on 'hollow words', where he states that psychopaths are masters at surfacy, flowery protestations of love and devotion, and even feigned apologies.

He quotes one woman who had shot three of her children and had a string of loveless, casual relationships with a score of men. In a love letter sent to one of these men she wrote "... promises of undying love, endless devotion, and oaths that no-one else on earth would ever touch me..." as she was preparing to have sex with yet another lover moments later.

Bad-tempered liars

Dr. Hare makes the point that psychopaths lack the capacity to impart real feelings to words — they cannot help but be hollow. They are frequently extremely thin-skinned and display hair-trigger tempers. They are smooth talkers who like to impress people. They are convincing liars, tellers of tall tales, and frequently talk at a fast, staccato-like pace, giving little chance for anyone else to enter the conversation.

Seldom do they show any remorse for their destructive behaviour and, if they do, it is usually to get themselves out of an unpleasant situation. Dr. Hare says that no-one is immune to the devious machinations of a psychopath. You can only reduce your vulnerability by removing yourself from their paths, proximity or orbits.

Psychopaths are jumpy, unsteady, nomadic in moving from place to place, from relationship to relationship. They usually want their earthly desires filled immediately. If they are hungry or thirsty, they want everything dropped to satisfy their needs.

Modern-day vampires

They cannot deal with money, rarely, if ever, managing to save any. If given money, they fritter it away on useless gadgets and gizmos. They do not look after their possessions. Even expensive ones, such as cars and stereos, are treated as children treat toys — they are enamoured by them for a short while, then toss them into a corner — dirty, broken, damaged and uncared for. They treat relationships likewise. They abandon apartments, leaving furniture, clothing, even private belongings. They simply walk away from jobs, supposed friends, husbands or wives, even children, to satisfy a whim of the moment, to latch onto a new victim — almost like modern-day vampires.

Dr. Hare says that psychopaths show no loyalty to groups, codes or principles, other than to "look out for Number One." Law enforcement agencies often make use of this tendency when trying to solve a crime or break up a gang or terrorist cell. And, of course, nationalist groups, for they have adopted the sinister definition of their political opponents as being no more than criminal gangs! They offer: "Be smart. Save your own skin. Tell us who else was involved and you'll walk." This is more likely to pay off with psychopaths than with the ordinary criminal.

"Fiery speeches and outrageous remarks" — hallmarks of the agent provocateur and psychopath alike; indeed, both attributes are very often combined in the same person. Loud-mouthed bigot, crook and convicted thug Ray Hill (in white jacket) turned into an informer for the far left when other sources of money ran out, becoming a star speaker on the well-paid 'anti-racist' circuit of Student Union bars. Recently, however, Searchlight has dropped his regular column — has he done the dirty on Gerry Gable as well?

I remember reading a book by New York City's Chief of Detectives, Albert Seedman, called Chief, in which the author describes how they cracked open the New York branch of the Jewish Defense League.

They concentrated on the most activist, most vociferous, most fanatical JDL member, an obvious psychopath, and whacked the JDL wide open in short order. He rattled out on all his friends. The same has happened to so many left-wing and right-wing movements, and even some spy rings during the war, throughout the pages of history.

50 per cent of serious crimes in America are committed by psychopaths; 20 per cent of the prison population are psychopaths — so don't feel badly if you have been victimised by one. There are millions upon millions of them out there on the loose. They come in every shape, age, sex and colour!

The only way to protect yourself from them is to be on the lookout for some of the signs. Look for the incessant talkers, the people with thin skins and foul, abusive language, those who are leeches on their friends, the sexual deviants — and especially watch for people who laugh at inappropriate times! Be careful. Stick to common sense. Rely on your instincts and stick to your core values. If an individual looks, sounds or acts in a way that seems too good to be true, however much you could use their seeming smarts and talents, trust yourself: They usually are too good to be true!

Has British Nationalism come of Age?

CAN ANYONE explain why we are beginning to feel such a sense of optimism about the future for our movement? The pages of this journal and the other party publications are positively buzzing with it. Readers don't need to be told that something significant has changed. They can feel it in their bones. And as morale rockets to new heights, so the rate of party activity soars with it. But what precisely are these changes and why are they having such a dramatic impact on the party?

Certainly the BNP has had some impressive election results in recent years but let's be honest about it, we are hardly knocking on the gates of power without even a parish council seat to our name. Certainly the continued progress towards the unification of the nationalist movement under the BNP banner is a cause for celebration but we are still, as yet, a small organisation. Recent events like the merger with the West Midlands National Democrats and the outcome of the Griffin race case all contribute to the sense of excitement but, by themselves, these are minor steps forward along the long journey towards political power.

But make no mistake, that journey has now well and truly started. And the reason for this has nothing to do with the various minor improvements in fortune that we are now experiencing, welcome though all of these are. These developments are themselves more likely to be just symptoms of a sea change in attitude which has been sweeping through the movement and which is now almost complete.

Challenges

Put very simply, this change represents the coming to maturity of the British Nationalist movement. Just as an individual must pass through childhood and adolescence and make and learn from mistakes to equip him or her for the challenges of the world, so it is suggested, must political movements.

When one views the current developments in this context one begins to realise what a formidable adversary the BNP has become for the forces that are presently occupying our country. For we are not simply a 1990's version of the National Front or of the League of Empire Loyalists, or of the British Union or of any of the other patriotic groups from which we derive our ideological pedigree.

We are in fact the product of all of these organisations because they were individually simply phases in the long evolution of a single movement that has only now reached its maturity in the current British National Party.

Each of these organisations has made its own mistakes and the BNP has, of course, made its own share too. As the adult incarnation of all these earlier organisations, however, we now have the benefit of lessons learned by all of them. In consequence, a vast pool of collective wisdom now resides within our ranks that has never before been at the disposal of a nationalist organisation. Recent developments demonstrate that we are now beginning to appreciate this awesome power that is now at our disposal, as we tentatively begin to put some of these lessons into practice.

For a start we have recognised that, in the modern political game, image is everything. Only twenty years ago party activists still talked about 'controlling the streets' as a primary objective for the movement. Muscle and marches therefore took precedence over manners and marketing — and how the media loved it! Television images of hard young men wielding boots and Union Jacks helped to ensure that, for a generation, the radical Nationalist message fell on deaf ears. We won't make the same mistake again! In a world dominated by images and electronic communications the task is to control perceptions, hearts and minds, and the only street worth bothering about is the information superhighway.

As demonstrated by Nick Griffin in last month's Spearhead we have also now learned that we have the power to shape our own image. In the past the hostility of the media was often used as an excuse for poor presentation and inappropriate public behaviour. How familiar were those defeatist voices in the declining days of the National Front proclaiming the futility of trying to court respectability! Whatever we did, so the argument went, the media would continue to misrepresent us, so why bother?

Yes, of course they will always try to misrepresent us, but a mature understanding of this fact must also acknowledge the media's dependency on available material to distort. As Nick Griffin noted in his article:-

"The better our reality, the less material the media will have to distort into a bad image."

Having learned the lesson that we can shape our own image, we have shown a willingness to do just that. The 'suits and smiles' approach 'on the doorstep, the production of professional standard TV and video productions and the impressive quality of the Internet sites now supporting the party, all bear witness to the new confidence that we can, to some extent, control how the public perceives us.

Whilst image may indeed be everything, an important part of that image is the presentation of our message. We have also learned a thing or too about that! There was a time when nationalists measured their virility by the strength of their rhetoric.

A thing of the past

Forthright, rigid, doctrinaire extremism, preferably expressed in uncompromising and offensive language and imagery were all too often seen as marks of one's loyalty to the cause. One National Front poster from the 1970s in particular springs to mind in this respect. One simply repeated the slogan 'The National Front is a Racist Front, Join the National Front!' from top to bottom, presumably in the mistaken belief that this was actually appealing.

All this seems a far cry from the party's new insights into the psychology of persuasion, described so ably for us by Dr Mark Deavin in his recent Spearhead articles. These new insights have, in turn, totally revolutionised our approach to propaganda. As part of this new approach, our stance on race, of course, remains completely unchanged.

Our presentation of that stance however couldn't be more different. Hostility to other races isn't even on the agenda. The concept of white supremacy has disappeared from our vocabulary and our emphasis is now on white survival. Our respect for other cultures and races, always an essential ingredient of the nationalist philosophy, is now given greater prominence and helps to discredit those who brand us as 'racist'.

It is also now recognised that the presentation of policy should be more carefully tailored to different target markets. Examples of this include the success of British Countryman with the countryside marchers and the Defend Britain's Fishermen! leaflet in coastal towns, to name just two. There is also now a recognition that, important though it is, the race issue may have a limited campaigning role in comfortable areas which have so far escaped the scourge of multi-racialism.

In keeping with our coming of age we now have a calm and mature sense of our own identity. Yes, of course we offer radical solutions to the nation's problems that some may be wary of. Yes, of course, we are part of a tradition that has been out of favour in establishment circles for half a century and for which we make no apology. But, unlike some of our more youthful incarnations, our party's intention is not to shock, nor to confront, but to persuade.

This new maturity has given us the confidence to be self-critical and the courage to see ourselves as others see us. Secure in our own identity, we can also now explore methods that are not part of our own tradition but may nevertheless serve us well. The Labour Party may have pioneered women-only shortlists but contributions from Sharron Edwards and Joan White in last month's Spearhead demonstrate that we too are taking the role of women in our organisation seriously. Likewise, the Liberal Democrats may have pioneered community politics but we are determined that we shall be its ultimate beneficiaries!

Mainstream

These changes are part of the process of what has been described as 'normalisation' — the reintegration of our political tradition into the mainstream life of the nation. In the past they would have been mistaken for 'populism' and some earlier attempts to achieve them were, unfortunately, just that.

Populism was a phenomenon which emerged within the movement during the mid-1970s which advocated changes in presentation through the dilution of policies in an attempt to attract greater public support. Unfortunately this also involved the denial of our nationalist ideology and tradition. Whilst arguably some short-term headway was made in terms of popularising the Nationalist message, the success was short-lived because of the lack of any ideological depth.

Persuasion, not confrontation. South Birmingham activists join the BNP's nationwide 'Buy British beef' campaign. The butcher put a leaflet in his shop window

It is a mark of the maturity of the British National Party's membership and a testament to the lessons learned since the 1970s that the current changes have not been rejected as 'populist' but have been enthusiastically embraced by the movement. For they are recognised for what they are. Far from challenging the long nationalist tradition and its deep ideological roots we all now revere these as the ultimate bedrock of our movement. The recent changes confine themselves to the task of advancing that tradition into the political mainstream and ultimately, into government.

For any liberal readers out there, mark my words, this is your worst nightmare come true!

The BNP and its image

Some recent things said and written about the British National Party, by friends as well as foes, may have created certain wrong impressions concerning the party's past attitudes on questions affecting its attitude to the general British public, whose support it seeks. These faulty impressions also cover the public relations attitudes of previous nationalist groups with which some leading persons in today's BNP were once connected and into whose PR techniques they made some input.

Below is part of a letter written by BNP leader JOHN TYNDALL to a party member who had raised some points on these matters. The member's name is deleted. We are reproducing this because it may help to correct some misapprehensions popular within the party on the subject in question.

Dear Member,

You speak of an attitude on the part of the BNP that, to quote, "if a person cannot stomach our chosen style of presentation, we do not need him." That would be a very foolish attitude for any party to take, and I have certainly never taken it — except, perhaps, towards a minority section of the public which will always hate us whatever we do or say. It does not seem as if your friend comes into this category.

What I have, however, said on more than one occasion is that there is a certain category of person of broadly patriotic inclinations who does not like what is going on in the country and on many issues stands on the same ground as the BNP but for occupational or social reasons would rather not get identified in the eyes of work colleagues, friends or family with a political group which, rightly or wrongly, carries about it a certain odour of disreputability that has been given it by the mass media. The only ultimate way to make ourselves acceptable to such a person is to develop such a powerful and far-reaching voice that, like the Front National in France today, we can put across sufficient of an image of decency that we can allay such people's fears and inhibitions. However, even if we should do this, it has got to become sufficiently 'normal' in the public estimation for a person to support the BNP — just as in France today it is 'normal' for a person to support the FN — that fear of effect on work colleagues, and/or friends and family will diminish.

We are constantly trying to refine our propaganda, and in that respect have scored a number of valuable victories. You say that you have seen British Countryman — which could hardly be called 'extreme'. We are now going into the business of producing video films. We have three well-presented web-sites. In all of these sectors we come across as very unlike the stereotype of the tattooed 'nazi' hooligan of mass-media creation.

Inaccurate presumptions

However, if people persist in presuming us to conform to the latter, and are unprepared to put themselves to the little bit of time and trouble required to find out if this assumption is correct, there is nothing I can currently do about it. I would have to say that such people's concern for the state of their country, and their desire to find someone who is fighting against the drift, just cannot be strong enough.

Has your friend seen an example of our literature? Did he see our party election broadcast in April last year? Has he been to a meeting? If so in any of these cases, perhaps he would tell us what is "too domineering" and "too arrogant"? We would then study what has been written or said, and decide if his objections are justified.

At the end of the day, I think that I would have to refer these people to a cartoon which we published in Spearhead about three years ago which showed SS Britain, with John Major (then premier) at the helm and the ship in about the position the Titanic was in when it was a matter of seconds, if not a minute or two, from going to the bottom of the ocean. Within sight and within reach is a lifeboat called 'BNP'. Major is saying: "Don't go with those people — they're extremists!"

Faint-hearts

There seem to be folk in this country who would actually prefer to see us suffer the fate of the Titanic than soil their hands getting involved with people manning a lifeboat whom they perceive, however falsely, to be "too extreme" (or "domineering" or "arrogant", as you prefer)!

If I do ever commit the error of appearing rude to my friends and collaborators, however much my intentions are to the contrary, it probably is when they speak (or write) as if to suggest that after some forty-odd years in the political fray — forty-odd years in which I can say that I have achieved greater success by comparison with any other nationalists in this country during the same period — I am strange and oblivious to the need to project a good party image and need telling that I must do so!

Speaking still of the need to project a good image, you say that you are "pleased to observe that this point of view is at last gaining credibility with the BNP." Wrong!

March by the old National Front, headed by ex-servicemen and band. Concern with presenting the right image is not a new phenomenon

There never has been a time when it has not had credibility.

What must be understood, however, is that for much of the first period of our career as a party, co-inciding with the 1980s, it was quite impossible to extend our influence and popularity beyond a tiny marginalised section of the British public. With Thatcher riding high, and the 'Falklands Factor' still fresh, only a very few could be bothered to notice us whatever we said or did.

We then therefore adapted our strategy and tactics to that situation, doing our best to consolidate our support among hard-line 'believers' while not deceiving ourselves that we could widen this support very much, least of all score good votes in elections.

As the 1990s dawned, the signs started to appear that this situation was changing, and we endeavoured to change with it. This could not be achieved all at once, but it started to do so by degrees. The one constant in all this has been that we have taken care to cultivate that image which, at whatever time, was reckoned to serve us best in terms of the support we could realistically hope to win. As the range of that support potential has widened, so we have recognised the need to project an image which take this wider range into account.

I sometimes find myself a little amused when I hear or read of well-meaning, and usually though not always young, people in the nationalist fraternity sounding off as if the BNP had never heard of the arts and crafts of good image-projection before the likes of themselves came along and shone the torch which guided us out of the caves. I have spent more years thinking deeply about these questions than most of them have enjoyed years out of the cradle, and, as I have said, do have a few political achievements under my belt.

Image projection

This is not to suggest that I know all the answers or that in the business of image projection I always hit the target exactly. Sometimes I can be mistaken, and I always welcome intelligent ideas on the subject from all quarters, of whatever age. But I do find it a little insulting to be told, if only by insinuation, that all our political past — including the period in the 1970s when, under the direction of some of us with others, the National Front became the largest and most successful post-war nationalist movement in Britain — was lived in ignorance of and unconcern for this very important subject.

The particular writer in Spearhead to whom you refer was giving his own individual slant on the subject, as every individual writer does. We published his article because it is our habit to give a free forum to all views within a broad nationalist spectrum. But we do not have to agree with every word written.

WANTED: MORE SPEAKERS

WITH BNP units around the country either growing or being set up from scratch, there is an increasing demand for new speakers for party functions.

Branch meetings in particular are always more enjoyable, interesting and productive when members and supporters are able to listen to a good presentation of some aspect of BNP policy, current affairs or British culture. Unfortunately, however, there just aren't enough experienced speakers on the circuit to enable units to have new faces every time.

And yet we know that the party includes various individuals who are capable of giving an interesting presentation. The problem is that organisers in other parts of the country often don't know that they are available.

While speakers are not paid, they are always given reasonable travelling expenses, and can usually be found overnight accommodation if they have a long journey. And they get the satisfaction of knowing that they are helping to build the local units which are the basis of the BNP's growing strength.

So if you think that you might be able to help out in this way, please send details of your preferred subject/s, experience — if any — and your availability to: P.O. Box 14, Welshpool, Powys, SY21 0JQ.

We are also interested in hearing from members who wish to become BNP speakers, but feel they need training before starting on the party circuit, and who would be willing to attend a special training seminar on the subject later in the year. Don't be shy, let's hear from you today!

Have you joined the Welling Club?

The Welling Club is a special group which exists to help raise money for the British National Party. Membership is open to all persons, whether or not BNP members, willing to contribute £20 each month to the party's national funds.

Welling Club members are sent regular bulletins informing them of the progress in achieving various important BNP targets which is being made with the help of their donations. They are also entitled to attend, free of charge, an annual club dinner addressed by the BNP Chairman.

Those wishing to join the Welling Club should apply, sending their initial £20 contribution (made out to the 'British National Party'), to: PO Box 117, Welling, Kent, DA16 3DW

Remember the BNP in your will!

We wish all our readers a long life, but none of us can stay on this earth for ever. Have you ever thought about how you can help the cause when you are gone?

The British National Party has benefitted immensely from a few of its supporters remembering the party in their wills. In most cases the money has been invested so as to guarantee the party a regular income, rather than being spent all in one go.

Why not become one of these benefactors yourself? Whatever you do, make sure you do not die intestate and so let your estate go to prop up the anti-British Establishment!

It is natural that if you have a family you should wish to provide for them, but nevertheless you may well like to set aside something for the good cause as well. If, on the other hand, you have no next of kin, there is all the more reason for ensuring that the Cause gets something by which to remember you.

If you require any advice on this matter, please ring or write in and we will be pleased to help.

SIR: I have been a reader of the right-wing Tory magazine Right Now! since its inception. It seemed like a breath of fresh air — unashamedly pro-British, pro-white, strong on law and order, opposed to EU rule, etc, etc. And its staff and contributors are no literary slouches; a dictionary is always at hand when I read it.

"Could this be the new, true, well-bred, patriotic Conservative 'Messiah' at last?" one asked.

However, as time went by, little chinks of doubt appeared. Contributions about, and direct questions on, such subjects as the power of the bankers and the Bilderberg Group (recently 'outed' by the Mail on Sunday magazine, 14th June, 1998) were all politely ignored. Likewise, why no acknowledgement of their fellow patriots in the BNP?

Gradually, I formed the impression that its staff believe that only they, the 'Cons', are really fit to run things like organised British patriotism. Yet they failed miserably to clean up the stables while in office for two decades, and they would fail again.

Those who edit and contribute to Right Now! might do some good if they were in power, or able to have some influence over those in power, but they never will be. They will always easily be overpowered by their liberal-internationalist, Money Power-controlled Tory chiefs, and always outnumbered by liberal types at grass-roots level. The leadership of the BNP, on the other hand, will at least always have the patriotic backing of their entire membership. If we come to power, things will get done!

SIR: My belated congratulations to John Tyndall on his masterly appreciation of the TV spectacular on Oswald Mosley, which was watched by millions. Although I knew Mosley slightly, I knew his two Executors in the late forties and early fifties very well, namely Robert Rowe and Jeffrey Hamm, so I can vouch for the veracity of John Tyndall's article.

I was strongly opposed to war with Germany in 1939, but as a Regular Reserve naval officer I had to accept the 'King's Shilling' and had no option but to serve. In 1940 my humble views were shared by many illustrious figures, including Captain Maule Ramsay M.P., Vice Admiral Barry Domville (Late Director of Naval Intelligence), Lord Halifax, and R. A. Butler M.P., most of whom were pilloried or imprisoned by that political charlatan, Winston Churchill.

Churchill is often portrayed as a great and gifted war leader and strategist — utterly false! His first military disaster was the Dardenelles in 1915. Air Chief Marshall Dowding won the Battle of Britain by refusing to send all our fighters to France to back up an already defeated nation. North Africa was virtually lost when Churchill demanded the bleeding of the army and navy of vital men and material to bolster Greece and Crete.

The disastrous Russian convoys of 1942-43, culminating in the shambles of PQ17, were forced upon an unwilling and dying First Sea Lord by the domineering premier, and the Singapore Disaster of 1942 was also all Churchill's making.

Fifty years on, the real truth of history is emerging on many fronts. Thanks to John Tyndall for correcting just one more myth.

SIR: I can't help wondering if the jury in the Nick Griffin case was rigged? Since all pollcards are kept, it would be a simple thing to find a load of regular Labour voters and arrange for them to be called for jury service that week and, bingo, the chances of a conviction rise immediately. The trouble is that one can get paranoid thinking along such lines, but stranger things have happened.

I think things are going to get very interesting politically over the next few years. The Labour Party is slowly beginning to unwind with the unholy coalition starting to split apart, the Tories are hopelessly divided and the Liberals remain as hopeless as ever. Add to that the crumbling economies in the Far East and Russia, rising nationalism in France and Germany, Kosovo, Cyprus, India and Pakistan, the end of the Israeli/Arab peace agreement, EMU, and the certainty of Northern Ireland failing to go peacefully down the Blair sell-out road, and I believe that in the next ten years our time will come.

I have always felt that when things change they will change very quickly. After all, how long did it take for the Soviet Empire to collapse once it started to go?

Strangely enough, I have a feeling that there is a psychological fixation with the change on the millenium (albeit a year early!) which seems to be conditioning people for a major convulsion. I have been telling people for quite a while now that in fact we are in Vienna, 1900, with everyone partying on and pretending the future is rosy, but to anyone with any degree of intelligence it is apparent that the whole thing will simply fly apart.

SIR: Having read the excellent articles concerning nationalist unity in last month's Spearhead, I would like to urge all readers to buy back issues of edition no. 351 (May) and pass copies to worthwhile nationalists who are not yet members of Britain's premier nationalist party. Having myself been a member of the National Front in the early '90s (until I left to join the BNP in 1993) I only have one regret — I wish I had joined years sooner!

SIR: The two worst Prime Ministers in our history:-

- 1) Attlee ("the sheep in sheep's clothing"), who let in the first blacks in 1948;
- 2) Blair ("the most dangerous man in Britain"), who appointed the first black Minister.

Samuel Butler, who wrote Erewhon ('Nowhere' backwards) in 1872, foresaw today all too clearly: "...it is one of their peculiarities that they very often do not believe or mean things which they profess to regard as indisputable."

Since the death of Enoch on February 8th, not a single MP has had the courage and integrity to say out loud what everyone thinks.

SIR: My wife and I have just spent a few hours putting copies of British Countryman through letterboxes in farms and big houses around Rutland Water and Kimbolton. These are fairly 'posh' areas but I feel they could be fertile ground for our message because:

- i) Many such areas are threatened by the blight of house-building, which is caused by the things we oppose — immigration and the break-up of the family;
- ii) Everyone I spoke to, including farmers, seems to have given up on the mainstream parties;
- iii) The 'Enoch was right' syndrome — yes, it was there today.

We mustn't forget the cities, but we must broaden our appeal and find ourselves 'pastures new'. BC gets the message over very well to the increasingly threatened inhabitants of rural Britain.

*New titles are marked with stars * Please note this fact, which is of great importance: the books sold through the BNP Book Service are written by many different kinds of authors holding a number of different political viewpoints, very few of them being in any way connected with the British National Party. The party's Book Service distributes these books because it is felt that they fill important gaps in public information and understanding of vital national and international issues. This does not mean that all of what is printed in these books should necessarily be taken as representative of the policies of the British National Party. BNP LEAFLETS

HIT TORY BLAIR WHERE IT REALLY HURTS!

After successful trials in East London, the BNP's Stop Labour's attack on the welfare state leaflet has now gone national. Blair has thrown the working class on the global economy scrapheap — let's make him pay! £6 per 1,000 plus £5.15 p&p, or just £5.80 postage for 2,000.

Striking two-sided leaflet. Red, white and blue colour scheme lends visual impact to an excellent leaflet. All the best slogans are used including 'Rebuild Britain Now!' which features sections on 'Health and Welfare', 'A Decent Education', 'Say No to Europe!' and 'Rebuild Our Industry'. Other slogans used include 'Time For A New Party', 'Join Us!' and 'Make Britain Safe!' which focuses on crime-ridden Britain and identifies our solutions, including the rebuilding of a sense of national community — possible only in an all-white Britain! This is the fourth 'Spearhead' leaflet that the party used in the run up to the General Election and is just as useful now as it was under the Tories. £9.50 per 1,000, with postage charges of £5.15 for 1,000 and £5.80 for 2,000.

Join us! Highly successful recruiting leaflet designed for general recruitment campaigns. Gives brief account of best known BNP policies. A summons to battle!

Defend Britain's Fishermen! Attacks the betrayal of the fishing industry. Especially suitable for giving out in fishing areas.

Hang Child Murderers! Calls for the death penalty for the killing of little children — especially topical following cases such as the murder of little Daniel Handley by homosexual perverts.

Anti-Tory leaflet. Aimed especially at disillusioned Tory voters and activists, explaining why their party lost the election and must now be abandoned. To be followed by an anti-Labour equivalent as soon as Blair's electoral honeymoon is over!

These leaflets cost £5.50 per 1,000, with postage charges of £5.15 for 1,000 and £5.80 for 2,000.

Regular leafletting is the key to increased recruitment. These are first class propaganda weapons, use them to build the British Resistance!

For the first time, the British National Party is taking advantage of the video revolution to bring its message into your drawing room!

This short film has been made in support of BNP candidates in the coming local government elections in East London. Some candidates and one ordinary voter are featured in the film talking about the important local issues on which the BNP will be fighting — issues which the Labour, Tory and LibDem parties prefer to ignore.

Also included in the film is the party election broadcast made by BNP leader John Tyndall, which was shown to the whole nation just before the general election of May 1997. If you missed this, now's your chance to see it!

Because some households in your ward will not have a video player, we are not putting a copy of this video into every home. If you don't have a player, please pass the video on to a neighbour you know who has. If you do have one, please still pass the video on after you have played it to your family. We want the very maximum number of people to get this very important message!

ALL SYSTEMS GO!

WHAT a month! There's been so much newsworthy BNP activity that the reports could take up the whole of Spearhead if they were to do justice to the hard work of so many organisers, treasurers and activists. Even better, there are clear signs of a rapid increase in the follow-up rate from leaflets, with places as far apart as Nottingham and Truro seeing five enquiries from just 300 leaflets. This is a huge increase on the usual 'rule-of-thumb' figure of one or two enquiries per thousand, and is an unmistakable sign of a big change of public opinion in our favour. And it's paying off in terms of new units and organisational expansion in the last month too: New units are now up and running in Grampian (contactable through the Glasgow branch at present); Cambridge (contact 01223 302728), and Medway. The BNP's expanding operation in Northern Ireland has joined the growing number of units recruiting via e-mail, on ULSTERBNP@AOL.COM.

The move towards effective nationalist unity under the British National Party banner has also continued. The whole of the small but active Merseyside group of the National Democrats has now followed local stalwarts Barbara and Tom Goode in coming over to the BNP. Barbara was the NDP's regional secretary. Last year the team's campaign in a Merseyside European by-election resulted in a very creditable 5 per cent of the vote. Following discussions with Nick Griffin, the Goodes have agreed to get to work to mobilise a BNP unit to cover hitherto undeveloped North East Wales, Cheshire and the Wirral. Keen organic small-holders, they are also helping Welsh organiser Terry Cavill and activists in Cornwall to set up a study group on agricultural and rural policy.

Meanwhile, on the other side of the country, the very active new Sunderland group has made contact with the ex-NF activists in Newcastle who have been covering city lamp-posts with very effective locally-produced BNP stickers.

In addition to these developments, the round-up below gives a glimpse of the growing scope of local activity nationwide.

"BRITISH JOBS FOR BRITISH WORKERS"

This was the message taken to the Scottish market town of Haddington, near Edinburgh, on Saturday 27th June, following the announcement that the town's biggest employer, Mitsubishi, was to close its factory and lay off 500 workers. Twenty activists from Edinburgh, Glasgow and Dumbarton received an enthusiastic response as they gave out more than 1,000 copies of a leaflet about the closure and how it showed the weakness of an economic policy which relies on foreign investment and free trade instead of British ownership and a protected home market. Wake Up Scotland leaflets were also distributed, and sales of British Countryman were brisk.

A typical response came from one local woman, who stated simply that: "It's about time. No-one seems to care about our own people anymore."

In the afternoon, the team moved on to join the 10,000 marchers at Edinburgh's annual Orange Order East Walk. More than 1,000 leaflets were well-received, and British Nationalist sold out completely. Overall, more than 2,500 leaflets were given out through the day, without a single unfavourable response.

CARLISLE ACTION — 'WHO DUNNIT?'

A long phone call from a journalist with the Carlisle News and Star was the first we heard of a very successful day's work distributing British Countryman and Theme Park Britain leaflets at a big County Show. The reporter commented on how such material could clearly have a big impact on the region's farmers, who are among the most hard-pressed in the country. Big local press coverage looks likely.

The identity of the activists responsible for this excellent initiative remains a mystery, but well done and get in touch!

BUILD THE BNP — READ AND SELL BRITISH NATIONALIST

The monthly official BNP newspaper. Eight big pages packed with news and facts the controlled mass media don't want you to get to know about.

July's front page exposes the little publicised Government decision to issue handguns to Sinn Fein-IRA terrorists who have been elected to the new Northern Ireland Assembly — so much for 'decommissioning' terrorist weapons! Plus a powerful attack on how Blair and Hague back the right of perverts to bugger boys too young to buy cigarettes or alcohol.

Dear Education chief, Jim Flood,
I am writing to you on behalf of all my class-mates, teachers, mums and dads. I am 8 years old and do not want to go to a big school, with all those other big boys and girls there. I want to go to a smaller, middle school so I can be with children of my own age and size.

I am frightened that the big boys and girls might bully me and my class-mates because we are so much smaller than they are. Mummy and daddy told me that the big boys and girls in the upper schools misbehave by bullying, smoking, drugs and snogging each other, yuck! My older brother goes to a big school and says that the other big boys and girls run amok, threatening to hit teacher. My mummy and daddy are worried sick about this and they say that you are completely out of touch with reality and have just ignored the wishes of all the young school-children, teachers, mums and dads. Daddy is also furious about the lowering of the age of consent for homosexuals from 18 to 16. I do not understand the big word 'homosexual', but daddy says that nasty men will be hanging around big schools looking for boys to kiss and cuddle with. Yuck! Everyone knows that boys don't kiss other boys, it's worse than kissing girls! All my class-mates, friends, mums and dads are sending this letter to you. Daddy has printed thousands of copies and we are not giving in without a fight! Would all mums, dads, kids and grown ups, sign their names and addresses at the back of this petition/letter? Thank you for sticking up for us kids, mums and dads.

PLEASE HELP US!

BRADFORD — MIDDLE SCHOOL CAMPAIGN STRIKES A NERVE

The ultra-liberal local press were finally forced to break their silence about the very active Bradford BNP by the distribution of 10,000 copies of an imaginative leaflet (above) over the threatened closure of several Middle Schools in white areas of the city. One woman who works at one of the threatened schools took 40 extra copies to hand out to her workmates. The reverse of the leaflet was in the form of a petition against the plan, and a little bird in the council's education department has told the BNP that more than 200 of these arrived on the desk of education department boss Jim Flood.

PEAK DISTRICT CAMP

The Summer Solstice weekend of 20th-21st June saw members of the BNP join with other nationalists at the Ring-UK annual camp in the beautiful Derbyshire Peak District.

The Saturday evening was spent in a neighbouring village public house, where the patriots were made very welcome by the locals. After the long walk back to camp, the barbeque was lit and a mead horn was passed around, with each member taking it in turns to propose a toast to the future.

The celebrations went on until the dawn of the longest day, when those who had waited to see the sun rise over the hill tops had their hopes dashed by the cloud cover.

Some of those present then walked to the top of Mam Tor, where the main road is still closed following one of the biggest recorded landslips in the British Isles in 1979. On their return, everyone piled into cars and set off through some of the most beautiful countryside in England in search of Treasure Hunt clues. The winner was Milton Ellis, from Wales, who answered every single question correctly.

The weekend was enjoyed by all, and raised £150 towards the BNP Euro election fund. See you next year!

FOOTBALL TOURNAMENT

Teams from BNP units all over the Midlands and North of Britain took part in a very enjoyable football tournament held in Nottingham in mid-July. More details and photographs in a full report next month.

Some of the players returned home by way of a meeting in Leeds, which was addressed by Eddie Morrison and Steve Cartwright.

PETERBOROUGH

Following the controversy caused when the city's Labour MP, Helen Brinton threatened a local pensioner with Race Act prosecution for writing to here about the problems caused by anti-white Asian gangs, the local paper set up a telephone poll. The Herald & Post printed a list of BNP policies and asked readers to vote on whether or not they wanted to see the BNP set up a branch in the city.

The result of the poll caused Brinton to blow several more fuses. Out of a total of 1,445 votes, 955 — a whopping 66 per cent — were in favour of the BNP, with only 490 against. The Blairite robot expressed 'astonishment' and described the support for the BNP as 'very worrying.'

HEREFORDSHIRE

Nick Griffin spoke at the largest ever BNP meeting in this difficult area. 26 attended and the collection was £128.

BNP AT DRUMCREE

The good work never stops in the BNP! Kent activist Colin Smith still finds customers at the end of the day. See full report in August's British Nationalist.

Behind the goofy facade presented by joke MPs like Peterborough Commissar Helen Brinton (below), the spirit of Robert Maxwell still pervades 'New' Labour.

NEW LABOUR — SAME SELL-OFFS AND SLEAZE

IAN BUCKLEY peers under Tony Blair's rock

"Rail privatisation has created terrible rail services and made my life hell getting into London. The Tories would have privatised the Underground, which would have made my life hell once I got there. That's why I voted Labour — pure self-interest."

— Kent businessman, Colin Tibman

Things sometimes don't work out as the politically ignorant expect. As Mr. Tibman has now discovered, the London Underground is still going to be privatised — by the Labour Government he helped to elect! Plans are also well advanced to sell off the Royal Mint, Post Office, Channel Four and Air Traffic Control.

Gordon Brown intends to raise cash by selling British embassies abroad, in addition to ordering massive property dispersals by the Ministry of Defence. Every Job Centre is now owned by the Goldman Sachs merchant bank, a move approved by New Labour minister Harriet Harman. How long will it be before they sell off the bottom of the barrel?

In a particularly despicable move, the Government has begun legal action to cut payouts to sick and injured miners, already tossed upon the scrapheap by the previous lot of imbeciles. Whatever became of the party of the working man?

The financial/media mafia now controls the Labour Party as thoroughly and effectively as it once dominated the Conservatives. The Establishment now sees the Labour Party as a better vehicle for dismantling the Welfare State and for conning the public into the Euro superstate.

Meanwhile, the Government is as deeply embedded in scandal as its unlamented predecessor. Geoffrey Robinson and Helen Liddell, leading associates of pensions thief Robert Maxwell, enjoy senior ministerial posts with New Labour. Miss Liddell is even in charge of pension reform! One of her interesting previous experiences was as editor of Maxwell's Daily Record. Her duties there included following the Great Man into the lavatory, to record his thoughts for posterity!

What a crew! Time to take the first step on the long path towards restoring sanity and clean government.
